Q86. As you may know, many women use apps and search engines to keep track of their reproductive health - including tracking their menstrual cycles. However, these kinds of apps and search engines do not protect this data, and can sell or share a woman's data to anybody or any organization. This could include information like a woman missing her period due to pregnancy or seeking out abortion services, which could in turn be used to prove a criminal case against her in states where abortion is banned.

Knowing this, would you support or oppose Congress passing a law making it illegal for these apps and search engines to sell or share this data?
